WHINEY-CAT. (Copyright, 1916.)

Folk We Touch in Passing Chandler

What is your idea of equipping a boy to take his piace, eventually, in world of men! For out of The Boy will evolve The Man with just the traits of character

The Parents have instilled. So make him a Whiney-Cat if you dare!

The Parents didn't realize that out of a whiney-cat boy would evolve whiney-cat man. Else their training of The Boy might have been different and this story woull never have been told.

He was a dear little chap-or would have been had he not been whiney-cat. To look at him one might have thought him a perfect cherub with his fine soft curls for all the world like crinkled gold, and his wide blue eyes that always looked their wonder at the world. Sturdy Dr. and Mrs. John T. King, of Virginia, are spending a few days in

But the promise was never fulfilled. Because of The Parents.

They idolized him. He was their only one and some there were who said they were silly over him. So they were. But not in the way folk meant. Their silliness lay in letting their idolatry blind them utterly to the law of cause and effect. They lived to-day and forgot all about tomorrow, making it their one business in life to see that The Boy was kept perfectly happy.

To effect this they established the sort of guardianship over him which was sure to warp his moral growth; the sort of shielding that inevitably prevents any hardening of the moral and mental muscles.

When he played alone it was under the eagle eyes of one or the other of The Parents, so that the slightest accident that brought discomfort to the small person might be given instant attention. When he played with other children-which was less often-he suffered (or enjoyed according to one's way of thinking) the same espionage. No other child was really good enough to associate with The Boy in the estimation of The Parents-but in order to keep him from mental distress they had to ville, in Park road, was the scene of a allow an occasional such demeaning contact.

But they let every other child in the neighborhood know soon nough that they had others than The Boy to whom they must account Electrical Contractor, 2020 I st., nw., Washingto D. C. Every small person about was perfectly conscions that the little chap had champions so big and so watchful. So it came about that he speedily became an object of contempt and ridicule among his fellows as he grew from babyhood into youth, because of "Whiney-cat" was his nick-name at school.

And The Boy quite deserved the epithet.

Or rather The Parents deserved it for him. But it was The Boy who suffered.

As it is always the case that each individual must live his own life As it is always the case that each historian to the life of The Boy for so it came about that The Parents could not live the life of The Boy for fURNITURE—New and Slightly Used. And they hadn't equipped him to live it for himself with any degree of credit.

For, instead of letting him fight his own battles all along the way, and grow strong and capable in the fight, they shielded him from infancy from every rough place in life so that when he reached the estate of manhood he was nothing but a piece of maudlin moral pulp, detestable to his comrades because the only thing he knew how to do to utter per-

As a baby he had come running home to The Parents with every fancied grievance. And the grievances grew more numerous as his pampered imagination grew more vivid until The Boy came to believe that the whole world of other children was against him. It never occurred to him to buck up and take his place, their equal in self-defense. How could he of this day, according to the reading of anything so stimulating and sensible through the softening system astrology, but in the afternoon the Sun of puny protection with which The Parents encircled him? All through school he whined his way, pouring into the grieved ears of The Parents a never ceasing stream of complaint concerning the treatment he was accorded by schoolmates and teachers. And, as always The giving of presents is well aspected under this government. This configuration has a sinister power, also, as it is believed to encourage bribery and cor-

It never occurred to The Parents that The Boy might be to blame in any circumstances whatsoever.

He was their boy and he was, in their eyes, the quintessence of infalibility-a common idea among parents concerning their offspring, to be

But that didn't help The Boy.

For the Whiney-cat boy, in the natural order of things, developed into the Whiney-cat man, and when he went out into the world where he was forced to fight his own battles or go under-he went under. And through it all The Boy who had become The Man blamed the world, and whined over its mistreatment of him. In an instant Puss set off in pursuit. His good gray horse fairly flew and presently drew close to the rear of the wagon. "Don't give up!" yelled Puss, "Hold on tight!"
